

WHICH OR THAT?

Which and that are both relative pronouns. They introduce relative clauses. But English, being a language that it is, actually has two types of relative clauses: restrictive and non-restrictive relative clauses that signal the importance of the information they contain.

Non-restrictive Clauses

1. Non-restrictive clauses add parenthetical, non-defining information that is not necessary to the meaning of the sentence; remove it and the sentence still makes sense.

E.g. Zebras, which live in Africa, kill more people each year than do crocodiles.

2. Non-restrictive clauses are introduced by the correct form of which or who.
3. In English non-restrictive clauses should be set off by commas, dashes, or parentheses.

Restrictive Clauses

1. Restrictive clauses limit or restrict the noun or substantive it modifies.

E.g. The zebra that the lion attacked was clearly sick.

2. Restrictive clauses are introduced by that.
3. Because they are integral to the meaning of the sentence, restrictive clauses are not set off by commas, dashes, or parentheses.

Other Distinctions:

1. Which can only refer to inanimate antecedents (use the correct form of who / whom for animate antecedents); that can refer to animate or inanimate antecedents.
2. Which can be used after a preposition; but that cannot.

E.g. it is not correct to say "Is this the consul with that you fought?" but it is to say "Is that the consul with whom you fought?").
